TEACHING ACTIVITY

Official courses actually held for the Department

Applied Ecology (3d year of Bachelor in Environmental Science): Students gather information on the key concepts related to environmental resources and ecosystem services. They study ecosystem processes in ecosystems under anthropic pressure and examples of drivers-output relationships are given. The actual state of planetary resources is presented. The course also provides insight into the main methodological approaches which are used to analyse natural resources and their alterations and specific examples are given of approaches used for the quantification of environmental pressures and environmental footprints.

Ecotoxicology and Ecological Risk Assessment (2nd year first level Master degree in Science and Technologies for the Environment and Territory): The students learn how pollutants are distributed into the environment, through which routes and mechanisms they can enter in the biota and which effects they can have, analysing them at a level of increasing complexity, from cell biochemical interactions to the level of ecosystem community. The students learn how to include these notions into the context of the Ecological Risk Assessment (ERA) procedure, by studying the most relevant international guidelines of ERA.
